Carter, who is a young attorney, conducted a quiet canvass characterized by systematic organization, and his sweeping victory was a complete surprise except to those of his friends who were in close touch with the situation. Mr. Carter was a student at the University of Virginia, 1908-19 and took a prominent part in the college politics of that institution. He was editor of College Topics, the university newspaper, and is well known among the younger Virginia alumni of the State. Since leaving college he has taken a prominent part in politics, being a member of the City Democratic committee and was elected in	also marching from Gundalupe.  A telegraphic report from Colonel Mancilla, commanding the Federal Tegulars guarding the trains, to General Francisco Castro, says that Grategas forces were beaten, with 150 men killed and wounded.  The Federals claim they captured three raphi-fire guns, twenty wagon loads of provisions and several hundred horses. They also admit that twenty-five of their men were wounded.  Colonel Alberto Terrazas, commanding the vanguard of the provision trains, made no report, but the Juarez commanders say they think he proceeded south.
